Market and harvest reports

Drought impacts on vegetable growing

The first half of 2015 brought highly changeable and chaotic conditions for vegetable growing in Western Europe.

A cold spring that lasted longer than usual, delayed the start and the sowing of vegetable fields in most European countries considerably. It soon became clear that harvests could be delayed too.

From June/July onwards, we had to cope with tropical summer temperatures and very low rainfall. Open-field vegetable growing bore the brunt of this, resulting in lower yields and all that this entails. Southern Europe, where crops tend to be harvested earlier than in Central and Northern Europe, had already managed to finish most of the harvest, leading to more or less normal results.

Pulses were hit particularly hard by the lengthy drought in Central Europe. Harvest results were down by as much as 15-20% on normal on average. Some harvests of peas and broad beans were even down by as much as 50% on average levels. The available volumes from the 2015 harvest will therefore be significantly smaller. Even spinach, which is produced virtually all year round in the Ardo group, will not manage to achieve a full 100% crop due to the extreme drought and water shortage. Beans - another mainstay of fresh-frozen vegetable production - could turn out to be a different story: although low rainfall had an excessive impact on leaf growth, the growth of the beans themselves was also reduced. Also, as not all hectares were sown, this will undoubtedly result in reduced crops. The same situation applies to the potato crop, where lower volumes per hectare will be harvested, potentially resulting in lower available volumes coupled with price rises.

All in all, a rather negative picture for our growers' results and business for our production plants, inevitably leading to increased costs and rising prices for end-products.

As far as the markets are concerned, we foresee a continuing steady growth in demand for fresh-frozen vegetables in all segments. Confidence in the quality of fresh-frozen vegetables is rising. Our innovation also brings a new boost, as we seek out every customer, making us stand out for every consumer.

These two elements remain top priorities for Ardo and, in years to come, we will continue to make the necessary effort to invest in quality and innovation within our speciality.

SUSTAINABILITY

Let's meet in the field!

At Ardo, we're proud of our tradition of continually seeking environmentally aware, socially responsible and economically viable methods for growing, freezing, packaging and storing our products.

In addition to the high quality standards we set ourselves, we aim to produce fresh-frozen vegetables grown with the utmost respect for nature and the environment. We have channelled these ambitions into our MIMOSA programme, standing for Minimum Impact & Maximum Output Sustainable Agriculture.

As part of this programme, we organised a sustainable event together with our growers' associations under the title 'Let's meet in the field'. We want to inspire our growers, contractors and agrochemical suppliers and show that together we are already making great progress in constantly improving the sustainability of vegetable growing in Europe. We also want to share our future vision for a sustainable frozen vegetables sector, focusing in particular on organic production, which, in view of the current number of references and current volumes, is no longer a niche area. With an informative, practical tour in and around a testbed, we inspired visitors to continue their commitment to sustainable and/or organic agriculture in future.
